

Chapter 1

Crad with a “D”

Having a crab for a dad can be a real bummer . . .

He never tucks me in at night.
Or asks me how my day was.

2 Crab Girl

But he also never grounds me for not doing my homework. That's what my mom is for.

At least she and Crad are around.

That's better than the man who belongs to the final third of my DNA; the human DNA Mom spliced with Crad's to help make me.

I've never even met him, my DNA dad. If I had, maybe I'd have someone who understood me better.

After all, he gave me the part of my brain that makes bad choices.

Or, at least, that's what Mom hints at. "Why did you fall asleep in class on Tuesday? I never did that as a kid." Or,

What? It's not like Jack hasn't seen me chow down before.

Mom walks away and I scowl.

4 Crab Girl

She thinks I got my lazy juice from my mystery father, too.

Forget the fact that my other dad is a sea-lubbering crustacean.

But Mom has a soft spot for Crad and laughs when he blows bubbles. Nothing is ever his fault.

I sulk some more before taking a bite of my mashed potatoes.

It tastes like a sea drenched cupcake!

Mom must have used the vanilla almond milk again on accident.

There goes my appetite!

I turn to Jack.

"I'd rather be made of lazy juice than judgey juice."

Jack nods.

"And she called me a guest.
I've been eating here every night for like a year."

I can always count on good ol' Jack and his giant buck teeth to take my side.

Our brains are so in tune with each other that we think the exact same thing.

It's better than mind-
reading because it takes no effort;
we just know.

Jack nibbles on a piece of lettuce before waving the leafy green in my direction.

"Want some?"

"No way. That's bunny food."

I crinkle
my nose.

"Har, har. So original."

He shakes his fluffy hair to mock me.

6 Crab Girl

Whatever. At least he got spliced with something adorable. Why couldn't I have been mixed with bunny DNA?

Mom comes rushing in right on cue, water droplets splashing off her hands from the dishes.

Her hair frazzles as she speaks. And Even though she was born before splicing began, her sad eyes look part puppy right now.

8 Crab Girl

I can feel my face reddening to the same color as my claw.

There are too many things to list...

I bang my claw on the table and its wood cracks, too. I flinch.

Before Mom can say anything else, I kick my chair back and storm upstairs. I slam the door to my room. The shell curtain that drapes the inside of my door frame shimmies from the force.

Crad bubbles at me from across the room.

I stick my claw in his tank so he comes over and scrapes at the exoskeleton.

Good ol' Crad

I pull my claw back into the stuffy air of my room and shake off the droplets of saltwater.

They splatter my face, the outside of the tank, my bedspread, everything. But I like it. It's the crab in me, I guess.

Does my DNA dad like water, too?

Of course he did.

He doesn't like it when people are angry. He gets all twitchy and uncomfortable.

Just chalk my temper up to that part of me that does everything wrong, too.

10 Crab Girl

I make sure to stare straight ahead.

If I don't see Mom, maybe my chest won't hurt so much.

"I'm not mad, Crab Cakes."

"I am! Why did you make me like this? I hate it."

I hold my claw up in the air and snip-snap.

"I like the way you are.
You're unique."

"I don't want to be unique."

"You're right, dreadfully boring is a much better option."

I should have thought to splice you with a dictionary, instead."

Dictionary Girl!
Society's last defense against malapropism!

Mom puts a hand on my shoulder and leans in closer.

"I'm sorry I was abrupt at dinner. The double-shift I worked at the aquarium today was brutal."

Her words blow the heat right out of me. If I didn't break everything she wouldn't have to work so much.

Did something happen at school today?

Something always happens at school, Mom. I'm part crab!

12 Crab Girl

My day at school . . .

Stairwell
of DOOM!!!

Ouch . . .

Me frozen
in horror.
My face.

"They've been calling me Clutzy the Killer Crab ever since.

I'm weird, Mom, even for a splice. Everyone says it. Becca Chang said it today in front of everyone. And it's your fault. You did this to me."

Mom wrings her hands together over and over, then turns to face me.

I keep hoping that if you knew how much I love you it would be enough for you to be happy.

But you've grown up so much lately, maybe it's time I tell you more about your past."

I sit a little straighter and try to keep the hope from bursting out of my chest.

Will I finally learn who my DNA dad is?

Or where I came from?

Or why I am the way I am?

She pushes my claw down and strokes the hard shell, not that I can feel it.

Doesn't sound so bad to me . . .

I try to grasp the only anchor
I have to my past.

"Mhm. At the Zooborg Donation
Center there."

Learning where I was born, where I was created, washes my heart in gentle waves of comfort, but a cold undercurrent cuts through.

"Then why did we move to
To-freaking-peka, Kansas where nobody else is like me?"

Everyone here has a cutesy woodland creature or powerful animal splice
while I look like Poseidon's sea pet.

"Crabs are resilient and resourceful creatures. And we've built a good life here."

"Why was staying in Maine so important that you were willing to change my DNA?"

And if staying was so important, how did we end up in a state with no beaches? What's a marine biologist doing in Kansas?"

She reaches an arm around me, but salty bile climbs up my throat and I shrug her off.

"Are we in trouble or something?"

Did I break something with my claw when I was little?

Did I snap a kid's arm off on accident?

Or their head?

Gah!

Am I a MURDERER?"

"What nonsense."

Mom's laugh pulls me back to reality. She wouldn't laugh if I were a murderer.

But then my breath catches. I force my lungs to let the air go so I can speak.

"Is it . . . Is it something to do with my DNA dad?"

"Do your homework."

She stands and pulls my shell curtain open on her way out of the door.

"You know I don't care about grades as long as you do the work."

It's when you let the lazy juice take over and you do nothing that you get in trouble."

Her lazy juice comment nips at me like a remora on a shark.

Mom freezes in her tracks but doesn't turn around.

"I bet he isn't lazy."

"Who?"

She knows who I mean. I know she does.

"I bet he's great. And funny.
And does more than crawl around the bottom of a tank."

"Your biological father has done nothing for you, Annie, and he never will. Now go to bed."

"I want to meet him. I want a parent who doesn't think I'm made of lazy juice."

Mom turns and her eyes are as deep as a sea cave and hard as coral.

"You will never know your biological father. Goodnight."

She breaks off a strand of shells and throws it to the floor, then walks out.

Mom is wrong. My DNA donor dad has done something for me. He's given me a third of my DNA. A third of who I am.

And I'm going to find him.